History: Of the remaining six railway houses in the Historic Area, four have considerable architectural significance and mark the development in 1919 of low-cost, mass produced George Troup architecturally designed houses. These were pre-cut, numbered and marked for specific house types. Completed house ‘bundles’ were sent by rail from the Frankton factory to sites near railway stations, and took 2-3 weeks to assemble. The accompanying ‘drawings’ covered every facet of construction to aid the unskilled labourers. The other two houses and the Station Master’s House (and the two relocated) were made to Public Works (NZR) designs.

The Waihi Railway Station Historic Area has considerable historical, architectural, social and technological significance as the most complete collection of early railway buildings remaining in New Zealand. The railway houses represent a wide cross-section of typical railway architecture.
